

Distance learning and disability services for children

8-31-2020

COVID-19 is impacting families of children with disabilities in significant ways. While children continue to receive in-home community services through programs such as PCA, home care and waivers, you might have questions about distance learning and disability services for children. Here's a collection of frequently asked questions and links to helpful resources.

What are other parents doing during the day or during distance learning?

Many parents are using child care during the day to provide supervision when needed for work or other activities. To find child care, check out COVID-19 resources for families from the state of Minnesota.

How are special education services provided during distance learning?

Work with your child's school case manager or special education director to develop an education plan that includes options for services and supports during distance learning. See this fact sheet from the Minnesota Disability Law Center for more information. If you need additional help to develop a school plan, contact The PACER Center or another family support organization.

Can families that have a choice in learning models — such as in-person, hybrid model or distance learning — still use home care, PCA or a waiver?

Parents are being asked to make decisions that work best for their families. Children can continue to use home care, PCA or a waiver (including CDCS services) to support non-educational needs within their budget.

Can the services available through home care, PCA or a waiver be used to support distance learning?

Home care, PCA and waiver programs cannot be used to pay for education-related supports that are covered by schools or vocational services. Help with distance learning, educational needs or home schooling is not considered an allowable activity for these services. Schools are responsible for meeting a child's educational support needs under IDEA and as defined in the child's IEP or 504 plan.

How can my child's home and community-based services help with distance learning?

Educational supports are not an allowable activity for home and community-based services, so it falls to parents to support children with distance learning. However, you can use home and community-based services for allowable activities within your child's service budget — such as support for toileting, eating or transferring.

Why can't the program rules be changed or more flexible so I could use home care, PCA or a waiver to help my child with distance learning?

Program rules that identify allowable activities are established by law and would require a legislative action or law to change. These programs did not receive additional funding due to COVID-19.

If I'm struggling to meet my child's community needs, do I have any options?

Contact your child's case manager (if your child is on a waiver) or your local county social services intake to develop a service plan or explore resources to meet your child's needs. Depending on the program, you might be able to adjust your child's services or use other services within the program budget.

For additional resources, visit:

- COVID-19: Distance Learning and Special Education Services in Minnesota Public Schools | Minnesota Disability Law Center
- Special Education COVID-19 Resources | Minnesota Department of Education
- Minnesota Children's Cabinet